Stress, Inflammation & Hormones

Systems medicine is an interdisciplinary field of study that looks at the systems of the human body as part of an integrated whole, incorporating biochemical, physiological, and environment interactions. A systems approach looks at the interaction of various organ systems holistically.

In this seminar, 'Stress, Inflammation and Hormones' we will look at how stressors that occur in daily life create a low level inflammatory response, an immune response, which impacts the endocrine system. It dysregulates the endocrine function, and further impacts capacity to cope. This activation of endocrine stress response and the activation of chronic inflammatory factors, impacts our capacity to think and correctly perceive relationships and intimacy. The central and autonomic nervous system are also impacted negatively.

We will also look at several theories of emotion and how emotions are different from feelings. Looking specifically at the stress response and its impact on the endocrine system we look at botanicals that are able to treat several of these factors simultaneously. It will be an interesting seminar.
